RADICAL ANTAGONISM TO THE THEORY OF OUR GOVERNMENT.
It has been well observed that the several departments of government should act as a check, one upon the other. The experience of the world has shown the danger of conferring absolute authority to rest in one man or one body of men, and our whole system of government is the means of placing such power under such a check, as will render it safe and secure as possible. The Executive was therefore instructed with this power; it was thought a sounder source of security to Congress, and Congress, on the other hand, was given such power as would enable it to do its duty in the discharge of its functions.

The judiciary was constituted the arbiter on all questions of doubt, and its ultimate decision was binding, should be final.

During more than three-quarters of a century the fitness and sanctity of judicial decisions have been the subject of much discussion and reasoning of the Constitution. There are no objections that we could easily meet, but there are many which are difficult to remove.
